

The Rutland Reformers.

The Chicago Press & Tribune thus happily bills off the late convention of abolitionists, free-lovers and spiritualists at Rutland:

"We have read somewhere of a gentleman so fired with philanthropy that he essayed to reform the whole world in a fortnight—falling in which he became a settled misanthrope and retired to a cave where he could his days in soming at innocent idlings, while passing his doorway. We remember also the story of an ancient philosopher, who terminated his labors for mankind by plunging head foremost into Vesuvius—an act which was doubtless inspired by the gentleman's contemporaries. In each of these cases the impelling cause was the indifference of the public to their schemes for restoring Paradise—the remoter causes were dyspepsia and an unhealthy action of the liver. Any respectable physician could have regulated their bowel, and turned their energies to the cultivation of paradise, or some other calling in which the human race was vitally interested. It is precisely this treatment which is lacking to those utilitarians old ladies lately assembled at Rutland, Vermont. A simple course of cathartics, coupled with bathing and out-door exercise, will reduce the most of them to their unhappy friends. Prompt enjoining, with cold applications to the head and mustard to the feet will perhaps be necessary in some confirmed cases, but there are very few whose sanity may not be recovered by means known to the dispensary."

But the most senseless treatment is the world is that of disputation against their errors. Every Belieinite deems all the world crazy but himself, yet no one thinks of denying the errorries which he hangs on that slender preposition. If a man declares a Almighty a humbug, why spend time in convincing him of his error? If a woman's heart beats with love for everything in pantaloons except her own husband, why chaperone with her to show the extreme absurdity of her notions? Nothing pleases these people so much as notoriety; nothing spreads their distempers so fast as opposition. Each one believes himself the only true priest of the gospel, and the world is lost.
